Hunting Fossils May Be Pursued In Own Back Yard

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—Old fossils can be a lot of new fun and the person who has never thought to go exploring to find them is missing a lot of enjoyment. Many may have been stopped by three big hurdles—money, time and technical hurdles which are always envisioned when stories of explorations and explorers, such as William Beebe and Roy Chapman Andrews are mentioned.

For those, there is a great deal of encouragement in news that you don't have to possess those three things at all to go exploring for fossils because they might be right in your own back yard!

Go back a short space of time—say, a few million years—and see what conditions were in your back yard.

"Skippy" the Scallop

Picture a blazing sun shining on a broad, mirror-like sea. Far below the surface, zooming from one spot to another, is a little organism that closely resembles our present-day scallop. Not to be too scientific, we'll call him "Skippy."

It so happens that "Skippy," being a very active little scallop, reaches that stage in life when his usefulness is over and with one final spurt, gives up the ghost and sinks to the bottom. It isn't long before the shifting silt of the ocean floor has completely covered him over.

Years pass, the silt layer deepens and is compressed by the tons of ocean water above. And "Skippy," once a happy little bi-valve, is but a memory.

Following "Skippy's" demise, after a few million years of course, the broad expanse of sea shrinks to several large puddles, two of which we now call the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. And out of the depths emerges . . . your back yard. That, in a nutshell, is the whole story. It may sound a trifle fantastic but it is the truth and easily proved. Let's take a look at the stone walk you made last summer, the one from the house to the garage. See that large flat rock, about the third one from the end? See the small lump? Know what it is? Right the first time! It's "Skippy."

Field Stone Very Old

The "Field Stone" used throughout Cincinnati for walls, rock gardens and terraces is the old ocean floor of the Paleozoic and Cambrian ages. One small piece of this sedimentary rock contains thousands of fossilized specimens including "Skippy" and his cousins. You can easily pick out the beautiful sprays of coral, perfect impressions of marine plant life and the fragile skeletons of minute denizens of the deep. Each small fragment is pure exploration for you never know just what you'll find. There is always the possibility that you'll find new secrets concerning these ages of long ago.

The equipment needed for collecting these small fossils is no problem, you can find it in the basement. A hammer, a screwdriver or chisel and one watercolor brush of the cheapest sort, will do. Since this sedimentary stuff is soft, many times you can pick out fine specimens with only a nail file. The brush will come in handy for cleaning the finer details of the specimens. Once removed from the matrix, the fossils can be kept from crumbling with a coat of clear lacquer.

Trees Planted By Washington Still Standing

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Sixteen trees still standing at George Washington's Mount Vernon estate are undoubtedly among those planted by Washington himself. This has been announced following the application by Mount Vernon families of "detective methods" to history to determine the announced fact.

Robert B. Fisher, horticulturist at Mount Vernon since 1946, says it is virtually certain that 16 trees in an exhibition area near the mansion date back to about 1785.

In 1859 Benson J. Lessing wrote in a book: "I have before me the original plan of these grounds (Mount Vernon) made by Washington's own hands. It is very carefully drawn, the exact position and name of every tree to be planted are laid down."

Plan Disappeared

This plan has disappeared, but the book contains reproductions of portions of it. With this the Mount Vernon authorities have been able to locate the exact spots where Washington planted trees of various types. Today some trees of this type still are growing at these exact spots and are of the size they would be if Washington, or his slaves, planted them.

Washington was a tree-lover. His diaries contain scores of notes about trips he made to nearby Virginia forests to mark especially beautiful trees for transplanting to the mansion yards; of specimens or seeds obtained for him by such people as Thomas Jefferson, or of orders he had given his plantation staff concerning tree planting.

"It is always in one's power to cut a tree down, but time only can place them where one would have them, after the grd. (ground) is stripped of them," he wrote in 1795 from Philadelphia to his manager, William Pearce.

He also told Pearce that as a general rule whenever a field was to be cleared, some single trees or clumps were to be left.

May Have Planted 42

Some authorities believed as late as 1932 that around 42 trees dated back to Washington's time, but only the 16 now are included in the "undoubtedly planted by Washington" class.

"It's entirely possible that General Washington himself took a hand in the actual planting of some of them, at least he probably stood by and directed the work personally," Fisher says. "That is certain because of the interest he showed in the estate, the evidence of which is in his diaries and other writings."

The 16 trees consist of two white ash (Fraximus Americana), one American elm (Ulmus Americana), one hemlock (Tsuga Canadensis), four American hollies (Ilex Opaca), two honey locusts (Gleditsia Triacanthos), two Kentucky coffee bean trees (Gymnocladus Dioica), one Linden or Lime (Tilia Glabra), one white mulberry (Morus Alba), two poplars (Lirodendron Tulipifera).

The discovery of some old photographs eliminated many trees from the list that up to that time had been designated "Washington planted."

These are wet plate photographs taken at about the same time of the Civil War, showing trees near the mansion.

Navajos Remain Relaxed As World End Predicted

AZTEC, N. M.—Sixty thousand Navajos didn't bat an eye at a medicine man's prediction that the world was going to explode before next winter.

But 300 white neighbors rushed down to buy extra copies of the weekly Aztec Review, which carried the prediction, and discuss it excitedly with their neighbors.

The prediction came from an elderly, unidentified medicine man who noted that the ants and squirrels had not bothered to store food for this so-far mild winter. As a result, he concluded that next winter would never arrive.

His exact prediction was that Shiprock, a huge volcanic slab which can be seen for miles across the desert, would "blow big ship blow, go high in air, fall down on the Indian and John Collier." Collier was commissioner of Indian affairs under the late President Roosevelt.

The medicine man said the white man was to be punished because of his treatment of the Navajos (which once drew a congressional investigation) and because "the white man lives crazy-like."

The tribal leader indicated a few Navajos would survive the desert holocaust he predicted, and that he would be among them. But he held out no hope for any of his white brethren.

Townfolk who plant crops half by Indian share and half by seed catalogs indicated they were impressed by snapping up 300 extra copies of George Bowra's Aztec Review.

"However," the editor Bowra, said, "nobody's been impressed enough to offer me his bank book, house or farm yet."
